

Angie

Like all Smiths, Angie Smith was nice, kind, smart, strong, confident, and courageous. She and her father, Mr. Smith, lived in a small house in a field in the mountains. There was a little hill and stream nearby. Angie was very happy there, but she had no friends. One day Angie walked down to the stream to play, but when she got there, she saw that there was already a little boy playing there. When the little boy saw Angie, he ran over and asked if Angie could play. Angie replied, "Sure" and they ran off playing. Suddenly something terrible happened. Angie tripped over a rock and broke her leg. She told the little boy to go find her father. So, the little boy ran to Angie's house and after a few minutes, the little boy and Angie's father came running to her rescue. Angie's father lifted her all the way back home and set her in a bed. The next day for the whole morning, Angie's dad constructed a chair that moves, and he called it the wheelchair. In the afternoon, Angie tried it out, it took a little bit of time but at last she got the hang of it. After a year, Angie got bored with her wheelchair and wanted to walk again, so did her father. The next day instead of getting in her wheelchair, Angie called her dad. He helped her get to her feet, but she fell. Angie kept on trying and trying even though she kept on falling. Angie never gave up and one day she managed to take that tiny step forward. From that day on she kept on practicing her steps, until one day she is able to walk from her bed to the door and slowly but surely made it to the stream. She lived happily ever after.

Moral: Stay strong and never give up no matter what happens.